Chapter 1 by kuit baby

The Meeting

It was getting late. School had ended about two hours ago and he still was not here. He knew she hated when he did not come early

The court yard was completely vacant and eerie. Wind blew through the trees forcing the leaves to follow in any direction it chose. The leaves looked so weak from her perspective. Not trying in the least to refuse their master. She sincerely hated anything weak. She had tried so much her whole life to hold her ground that even the simple things in nature annoyed her. There were a few pieces of litter left behind by the less disciplined students of the school. Those at least used the gravel to put up some resistance against Mother Nature's second transporter.

She was getting dreary of looking around so she decide to update herself on his current situation. She pulled out her phone and dialed his number, but before she could tell him of her concerns and grievances, he sent reassurance of his coming over the line then killed it instantly. It was about thirty minutes before the purr of his red Ferrari coming up the hill. He absolutely loved that car. It encompassed all of his love life with the exception of her of course. She open the door and got in, forgetting her manners and asking him what took him so long instead of starting with a pleasant greeting.

"Good afternoon to you too!" he said. Her mother had told her to say so many times. But she was too shy to say it. He had to turn the car and head back to his office with
